Attachment 1 – Project

Exploring the Drivers and Impacts of Climate Gentrification in a Coastal City in the Philippines

Researchers have started to float the idea of “climate gentrification” as a mechanism by which climate change may contribute to pre-existing inequalities in housing (Best & Jouzi, 2022; Keenan et al., 2018). Scholars contend that climate change would affect property markets and people’s choice of residential locations, and can subsequently lead to changes in the demographic and socio-economic profile of neighbourhoods (Wang et al., 2023). While there are varying definitions of the term “climate gentrification”, researchers agree that climate impacts and associated adaptation actions may lead to differences in property values (de Koning & Filatova, 2020). Critical scholars warn that climate gentrification can threaten and displace poor and vulnerable groups (Anguelovski et al., 2019). Our research consequently attempts to explore the unexamined nexus between climate resettlement and climate gentrification.

We seek to uncover how climate resettlement might contribute to climate gentrification and how it might be worsening the pre-existing vulnerabilities of residents in coastal cities. To this end, we have identified a city in the Philippines, Tacloban, where there is anecdotal evidence of climate gentrification through climate resettlement.
